2 years before her son had come to buy some cheese, and she told him that he must first pay the sol he owed her. He alleged he had given it to a servant who had now left, which she knew to be false. Later met accused at mill, who said she was sorry her son had not given her the money; replied that it did not matter, and she gave it her for honour of God, but he should bring money in future. Few days later accused came early to house asking to buy milk, and she told her she had none. Next day her daughter became ill, 'toutte fantasque', and died in 2 days - if she were witch as reputed thought she had caused this. Also suspected of giving the servant concerned the illness from which she died, after she had complained about what son said and they quarrelled.

About 8 years before had been outside house at night, and saw her in middle of road, moving about and raising arms above head. Having heard she was suspected of witchcraft, he took fright and fled inside.

14 December 1619; voluntary confession

Judges were called to prison to hear her confession, and took her to town hall. She said she was a witch, and now renounced devil freely. Seduced some 12 years earlier by Mre Navé, when on way to woods at côte de Repy, angry that her husband was drinking in the tavern. Promised to give her so much money that she would not want, but it turned out to be leaves (seems to include second container of powder). A fortnight later gave her white powder; tried this on hen which died, then threw rest in fire. Went to sabbat once a year on côte de Repy. Asked if she gave him anything not to go more often, said no, but he had intercourse with her and for this reason did not require her to go so often.

24 December 1619; interrogation

Now said that earlier confession had been false, and she had made it to get out of prison. Had taken details from other trials she had heard read. Asked about some specific accusations, she denied them, but then started to confess again. Now confessed she had killed daughter of Gabriel Mercier, after minor dispute, on her master's instructions. Repented afterwards, when she found herself suspected. Had also killed the servant. Had been waving arms in street because husband was drinking in the tavern.

Confessed she had killed cow of David Roch, at master's instigation, after his wife refused her milk. had killed child of Barnard Huel after a similar refusal of milk. 7 or 8 years before Henry Virion's child was so ill it was a pitiful sight; spoke of this to her master, who advised her to kill it, which she did. 2 years earlier Didier Peirson, tailleur, promised to help her with sewing, but when he put this off she was angry, and at master's persuasion killed his child. Had given Claude le maire illness from which he died 3 years earlier, after he forgot to give her lard he promised at Easter; also killed one of his calves when she was refused milk.

Said there were many at sabbat, even small children in cradles, but had only recognized Jean Colin. Had made rain and bad weather by beating rivers, but she had never made hail because she feared dearth. Said she had killed cow of Jean Raimbault 6 years earlier; he was a drunkard who persuaded her husband to join him and run up debts by drinking.
